Portfolio Management Commentary

Destination Value Total Return Fund – Class IX USD closed February with a positive performance, bringing the result to +5.8% year to date and +25.6% on a rolling twelve-month basis. After a January that clearly highlighted the return of real assets, February introduced an additional element: risk perception across global markets increased again.

The geopolitical escalation in the Middle East acted as a catalyst within an environment already characterized by greater selectivity in the technology sector, emerging tensions in private credit and credit spreads that remain compressed relative to fundamentals. Markets increasingly appear to be moving toward a more mature phase of the cycle, where balance sheet quality and capital discipline become central again.

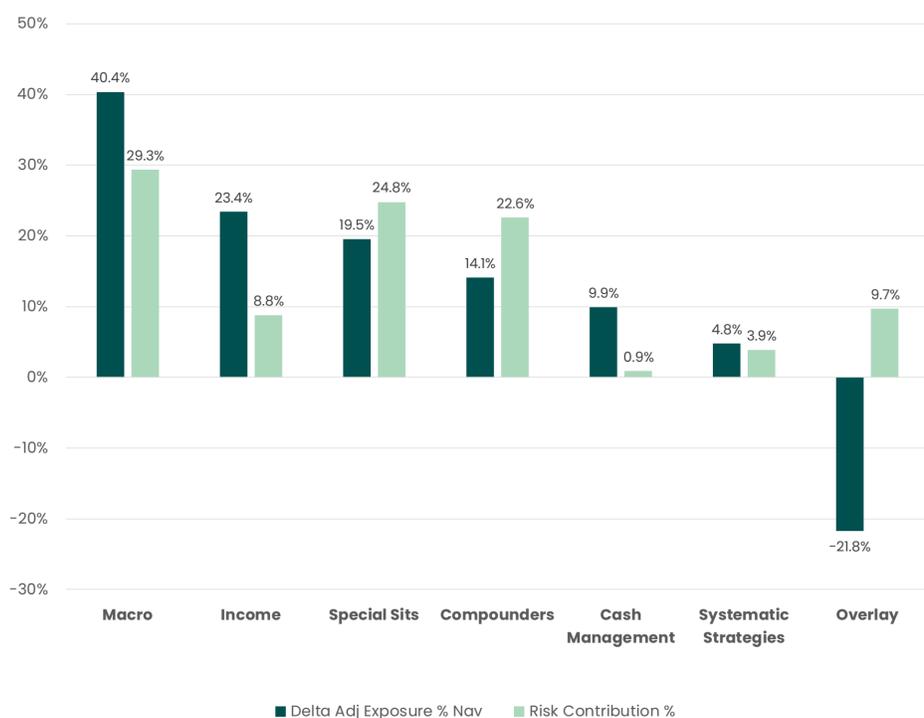

The repositioning initiated in the fourth quarter of 2025 continues to guide portfolio construction. The Special Situations strategy contributed approximately +1%, with Orange and Saipem among the main drivers. Increased exposure to European telecommunications and oil services reflects the view that, in a more fragmented environment, infrastructure and energy regain structural importance in sectors where supply has remained disciplined. The Fund also maintains significant exposure to real assets, particularly physical gold and uranium, which continue to provide diversification and capital protection in a more uncertain macroeconomic environment. The Compounders strategy contributed positively, with Samsung Electronics and TSMC among the main contributors, confirming the preference for the more industrial segment of technology, while Meta, Reply and Tencent detracted, reflecting increasing selectivity toward growth stocks.

The Macro Equity strategy detracted approximately -60 basis points, mainly due to consolidation in Greek banks after the strong rally in 2025 and weakness in uranium. Exposure to uranium is being gradually increased in view of the persistent imbalance between supply and demand in the context of the global return to nuclear energy.

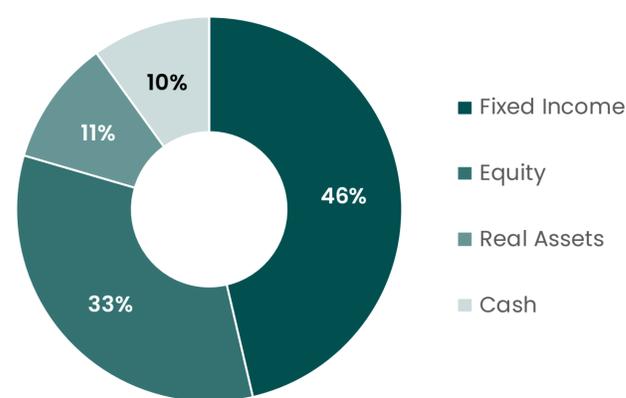

Overall, the portfolio continues to selectively accumulate companies that control real assets, infrastructure or scarce resources. As the cost of capital and market volatility increase, capital allocation discipline and risk management remain central. Looking ahead to 2026, the capital cycle is expected to remain the main driver of value creation.
